Fishes are Fantastic!

© 1964, WESTERN PUBLISHING COMPANY, INC.

Many strange fishes can be found all around the world. The facts about them are often amazing. The tiniest fish is the tropical goby , only one-half inch long. The largest fish is the giant whale shark which may grow to be more than fifty feet long. Between these extremes, there are fishes of nearly every size, shape and color.

The mackerel is one of the fastest fish in the sea with a speed of perhaps forty miles per hour at its best. Flying fishes in the South Pacific have winglike fins that enable them to leap from the water and skim through the air for as much as one hundred feet before diving back in. Mudskippers, lungfish and tree-climbing fish are all species that can leave the water and exist in the air for a short length of time.

Some fishes, such as the barracuda and tuna, prey on others. However, most fishes eat plankton, a jelly-like mass of tiny sea-creatures who grow rapidly under the sun like plants.

Deep-sea fishes live miles down in the ocean where no light ever penetrates. Most of them are blind or have poor eyesight, yet oddly enough, many of them glow with strange colors that they, themselves, cannot see. It is thought that these changing glows can befuddle big enemy fishes that attempt to chase and eat them.

Among the oddest names of fishes are the parrot fish, angel fish, porkfish, needle fish, sea robin, butterfish and catfish. Some fishes have odd shapes as well as odd names. The trunkfish is triangular and the sea horse is shaped like a horse's head with a horny body instead of scales.

The most unusual fishes include the following: the electric eel can touch you with its nose and tail and give you an electric shock; the flounder can change the color of its flat topside from pale yellow to deep brown, matching any kind of sand it swims over, and escape detection by enemies; the blowfish can puff itself up ten times larger than normal and discourage preying fishes from trying to gulp down such a huge morsel; the sargassum fish has streamers and ragged fins that resemble the seaweeds among which it hides; and the giant ray has enormous wide wings and actually "flies" through the water by flapping them.

Sharks are the most feared by other fishes for their fierceness and sharp teeth. If a shark breaks off its teeth in struggling with its prey, new ones begin growing immediately. Sharks over ten feet long include the tiger shark, hammerhead and white shark. When hungry, they will ferociously attack giant octopuses and even whales ten times bigger than they are.

Fishes cannot close their eyes and they never sleep, although at times they will simply float in the water and rest quietly to regain their strength. Certain fishes, like the herring, travel together in large "schools" or groups. Some schools of herring fill the water for miles and include millions of them. Fishermen seek out these big schools, then lower a large net to haul in tons of this food that many people eat.

About twenty million tons of fishes are caught every year. It is estimated that if all the food fishes in the ocean were regularly caught, they would feed ten times the present population of earth or thirty billion people.
